

Archdiocese Announces Common Start Date For Elementary Schools

In a further step toward creating a more cohesive school system, the Archdiocese of Baltimore has announced that all its Catholic elementary schools will open on the same day, August 29, at the start of the next school year.

Superintendent of Schools for the Archdiocese, Dr. Barbara McGraw Edmondson, said the decision to create a common start date is not only symbolic of the efforts being made to build a more traditional school system in the Archdiocese, but is also a change that will serve as a practical benefit to families for years to come.

“The common start date is a natural next step for our schools as we continue to progress toward the model of a more traditional school system,” Dr. Edmondson said. “We expect that over time our families, as well as teachers and staff, will view this as a benefit as they plan family vacations and other commitments.”

School administration and faculty will report back to school on August 22, 2011 for a special convocation for all faculty and administrators, including those in independent Catholic schools. While the start date will be the same for all Archdiocesan elementary schools, the rest of the academic calendar will continue to be set by individual schools. Independent Catholic schools set their own calendars.

The common start date is an outgrowth of the June 2010 Strategic Plan for Catholic Schools, which called for a number of changes to strengthen the Archdiocesan Catholic school system. Other changes recently implemented include the formation of an Archdiocesan School Board and the development of a professional development program for school administrators.
