Sister Marlene Weisenbeck, a critic of the Vatican's apostolic visitation of American religious sisters, has been picked by President Barack Obama to serve on the President's Advisory Council on Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships. The appointment was announced today.

According to a Feb. 4 White House release, the advisory council "brings together religious and secular leaders as well as scholars and experts in fields related to the work of faith-based and neighborhood organizations in order to make recommendations to the government on how to improve partnerships."

Sister Marlene, past president of the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, made waves in September when she appeared on CNN and raised concerns about the apostolic visitation, which was announced in 2009 to look at the quality of life of U.S. congregations of women religious.

"We weren't quite expecting to walk into this kind of process that would test our authenticity and our integrity," she told CNN of the visitation.

Concerned that Rome may expect American sisters to return to a more traditional form of religious life, the Franciscan Sister of Perpetual Adoration said "there is no turning back."

"I don't think that happens in any living organism," she said. "God doesn't turn the creation in opposite directions."

Here's a blurb on Sister Marlene's appointment from the White House release:
