Pope Francis to see 'Homeless Jesus' during U.S. visit

WASHINGTON - When Pope Francis approaches the Catholic Charities building in downtown Washington during his upcoming U.S. visit this month, he will encounter a "homeless person" covered in a blanket laying on a park bench.

The scene actually is a sculpture. And it's not a work of art depicting any homeless person; it's the bronze image of "Homeless Jesus."

"I hope Pope Francis blesses our 'Homeless Jesus' when he's here," said Roland Woody, a Washington resident who was homeless until earlier this year. "It's kind of a symbol of hope for the homeless in D.C. If the pope blesses it, it will be even more special."

If the pope does bless the 7-foot-long statue, it will be the second one of its kind that he'll have done that for.

Pope Francis blessed a smaller version of the "Homeless Jesus" sculpture during a late November, 2013, general audience at the Vatican in front of thousands of pilgrims.

Afterward, the pope told the sculptor, Timothy Schmalz of Toronto, that he thought it was a "beautiful piece of art" and a wonderful representation of Jesus.

Schmalz also created the "Homeless Jesus" statue in Washington, as well as similar sculptures in place in Toronto and several U.S. cities that include Denver, Phoenix and Chicago.

The arrival of "Homeless Jesus" in Washington came last winter after Washington Cardinal Donald W. Wuerl witnessed the pope's 2013 blessing of the smaller such statue, said Monsignor John Enzler, president and CEO of Catholic Charities of the Washington Archdiocese.

"It's deceiving when you first look at it, because it looks like a homeless person wrapped in a blanket laying on a park bench," Monsignor Enzler told Catholic News Service during a recent Wednesday evening Catholic Charities-sponsored dinner for the homeless, held just a few steps from the statue.

"When you get up closer you realize it's a sculpture," he said.

On more than one occasion, a homeless person has approached the priest and told him they could tell it was a statue of Jesus, because of the holes in the feet.

"They recognize it right away," Monsignor Enzler said. "It's very special."

Such reaction is what Schmalz envisioned when he began working on his first "Homeless Jesus" sculpture in 2011.

Viewers are forced to take a second look at the sculpture of a human wrapped in a blanket, face covered, with only the feet exposed, to recognize that it's actually depicting Jesus, Schmalz said.

"I can imagine some people walking on a city street, walking by thinking it's another homeless person, and then they'll realize it's actually a representation of Jesus," he said in 2013. "They will have that moment of reflection."

Monsignor Enzler said Washington's "Homeless Jesus" has inspired some to have a more compassionate view of the homeless and has provided the poor with a little dignity.

"People who are homeless here say, 'That's our monument, that's our Vietnam Memorial. That's our Lincoln Memorial. That's our place,'" he said. "They love it. They'll come by and they'll touch it. They'll say a prayer by it."
